

I visited Nukkad Pathshala a month back. Indeed, it was a great experience. I met a team that has a zeal to do something for the underprivileged. I saw the people who are responsible, generous, and compassionate. They are training the children of the nearby slummed area for their holistic development. The dark area is near to the bright city, completely untouched by development schemes. At the initial stage, how they convinced the parents to send the children to the Pathshala, how amid the scarce resources they managed basic teaching equipment and sanitation, how they were motivated, and what's their future plan. The explanation of all these was amazing. Many students are talented and creative, but all enthusiastic. It's nearly 40 days of their initiative, they sustained and developed. As independence day is near, I want to remind myself and the team, The speech of Pandit Nehru "tryst of destiny" has the potential energy to rejuvenate us, but our destiny is so far and big, definitely it will be substantially redeemed as we have all necessary character of its requirement. I wish them good luck and success.

Thanks.
